According to Milan, “This internship was very useful; I’m glad I continued. I’m sure that I will be involved with many projects over my career and what I have learned through this internship will be very helpful. And now I know where I can go for more information as well, so thank you.

Pells added, “Milan’s last few resources were outstanding, on the integration of project management with organizational change management and the often necessary use of micromanagement during a project crisis. These will be useful to many people in today’s complicated and rapidly changing conditions, and I think demonstrated how Milan came to recognize the potential value of his research. Thank you, Milan!
