A new industry report from Wellington reveals that only 36% of organisations mostly or always complete projects on time, highlighting ongoing challenges in project delivery and governance.

The findings come from Wellington's 10th annual State of Project Management Report, based on insights from project management professionals across organisations worldwide. The research was open to participants globally and captures perspectives from a broad range of industries and regions.

The report explores how organisations manage projects, the maturity of their PMOs, and the challenges that continue to affect successful project delivery.

Key findings from the report include:

- Only 36% of organisations mostly or always complete projects on time
- 72% of project professionals spend half a day or more collating reports each month
- 44% of respondents are somewhat or very dissatisfied with their PMO's reporting
- Many organisations continue to struggle to embed consistent project management processes

These findings highlight the ongoing pressure on organisations to deliver complex projects while managing increasing reporting demands and resource constraints.

"Organisations recognise the importance of effective project management, but many still face challenges with reporting efficiency, process consistency, and PMO maturity," said Vince Hines, Managing Director at Wellington.

"Our State of Project Management Report provides benchmark data and practical insights to help organisations understand where they stand and identify opportunities to improve their project delivery capability."

The report also includes a simple maturity checklist to help organisations assess their current project management capability and identify practical steps for improvement.
